TRANSIT SECURITY

In the past we've discussed what the chemical industry is doing to work toward better security. But what about transit? You know, the people movers. Since the London subway bombings last July, passenger railroads in this country have stepped up their security. They actually started tightening security after 9/11, but now it's even more so. Many of them are putting out public service announcements advising passengers that backpacks and other large containers are subject to random search by the police. Most of the transit agencies across the country have increased police presence, some even adding canine patrols and encouraging their employees to be more vigilant.

Transit systems nationwide have spent more than two billion dollars of their budgets on security over the last four years since 9/11! The main problem is money! In 2004, The American Public Transportation Association did a survey that showed security needs are actually over six billion dollars! Since 2001 the Federal allocation of funds has been around two hundred and fifty million. In the same time frame, aviation has received over eighteen billion in federal funds. At the present rate, we will never have enough funds to adequately handle the problem.

Let's face it. Passenger rail security has to be a daily commitment by every employee and passenger to make it as safe as possible. So far, so good. Let's hope it stays that way.
