The Wilder East

In the mid to late 1800's a new form of robbery evolved from the railroads. This time it occurred on the eastern side of the country. These robbers got away with more money than ever before. They were the railroads own Robber Barons. These were the likes of James Fisk, Daniel Drew and Jay Gould. The Robber Baron perception included men like Thomas Durant as well as Cornelius Vanderbilt and Leland Stanford.

There is some debate over whether they may have done more harm or good for the country. Their consolidation of multiple rail lines created a much better transport system. They created systems that spanned the country and allowed our country and economy to grow into what it is today. On the other hand, Fisk, Drew and Gould did much harm in the bilking of thousands in their stock manipulation schemes in their fights with Vanderbilt as well as the disaster of Black Friday in their attempts to corner the gold market. Durant created schemes such as the Crédit Mobilier scandal to divert federal funding into his own pocket. Stanford crafted legislation creating monopolistic conditions for his railroads. Beyond all of this, one thing is certain, most of them got away with millions.
