Growing A Fertile Nation

In 1800's farmers moved their crops to various markets throughout the country via rail. They had to live with whatever rates the railroad companies charged. Not only were they dependent on rail to move their product, but the grain warehouses were also in the hands of the railroads. At that time, large corporations, like the railroads, were not regulated by federal or state government.

Most government leaders felt that competition would regulate business and kept a hands off approach. Unfortunately these corporations took advantage of this, as well as the market conditions available to them at the time. The wide open geography of the west gave railroads a natural monopoly of their own regions. By conglomerating related industries, the big rail corporations were able to control labor as well as materials. This also allowed price control. The windfalls afforded by price control in turn allowed these corporations to fund political agendas further tightening their grip on the economy and the nation. It was not until the late 1800's that many in government were awakened to the growing power of big business.

The farmers, so dependent on rail to move their product, had decided to fight back.

Be sure to check next month's issue of "The Inside Track" to learn how the fight went down!
