RAILROAD WELFARE

There has been a plan within the Union Pacific to make improvements to the Donner Summit rail structure since 1996 when the Southern Pacific was acquired. At that time the projected costs for tunnel upgrades to allow double stacked freight containers was $18 million. The cost is now estimated at $86 million. The UP has sought public funding for half of these costs. The California Transportation Commission agreed to fund $43 million. In exchange for the millions, the Commission added a stipulation that passenger rail be included through Donner Pass.

In September UP Chairman Jim Young rejected the state's offer in a letter to Governor Arnold Schwarzenegger. "Union Pacific has consistently maintained (that) the Donner Project must be exclusively a 'freight' project. Therefore Union Pacific hereby withdraws the Donner Project from any further consideration for (state) funding and will develop and construct the project over time with its own resources."

Of course the questions begging to be asked are: Why ask for public money, if you don't really need it? And since it has already been over a decade in the works, if you do need the money, what will the cost be when you finally do get around to it?

Whether it is arrogance or just plain ineptitude, it shows with the Class 1 railroads, it's just business as usual.
