EVERYDAY HEROS

On January 22, in Pittsburgh, Conductor Edward Murray was running his engine in reverse, pulling a string of cars when he noticed two small children in real danger. Robert and Margaret Lewis, aged 2 and 4, had stepped onto the track before him. Murray jumped onto the track, swept the two into his arms and was able to jump onto the footboard of the engine, saving their lives and risking his own. For this feat of courage the President awarded Edward Murray a medal of honor. This was not the only time Mr. Murray had been so brave. He had previously been awarded a Carnegie medal for a similar act.

Why have you not heard of this heroic act? Because that was in 1909 and the President was Teddy Roosevelt. None the less, these acts of valor seem to happen more often than one would think. Just recently a young woman in New York fainted and fell off the platform and onto the tracks. As a train approached an unidentified black man jumped down to try to revive her. Having no time to lift her back to the platform, he was able to secure her in the shallow trench between the rails and pull himself out of the way. Five cars passed over her leaving her with minor injuries, and more importantly, alive. In all the ruckus and confusion, the man disappeared into the crowd without a word.

Last year a gentleman by the name of Chad Lindsey in a very similar circumstance saved a man from an approaching train. He too would have disappeared unknown had not a friend singled him out. As he jumped onto the tracks, Chad was in turn thinking of and motivated by another railroad hero, Wesley Autrey. In 2007 Autrey had saved a man suffering from convulsions by covering him with his own body as they lay between the rails, the train rushing over them both. Though time may erode the names of these fine people from our memories, our gratitude will always remain undimmed.
