THE GREAT RAILROAD STRIKE OF JULY 1877 Part 3

It became apparent that the local militia held sympathy for the striking workers in Martinsburg, and could not be persuaded to quell the strike by force. John W. Garret, President of the B&O persuaded his close friend Governor Matthews of West Virginia to request the aid of President Rutherford B. Hayes in the form of Federal troops. Governor Matthew's appeal to the President claimed that the law abiding people of the State needed protection from the domestic violence of the stiking workers. The local paper of Martinsburg, The Statesman, at that time, called this "pitiful subterfuge". That the Governor "knew full well that these starved men, were not in insurrection against the peace of the commonwealth". The Statesman went further in stating that in "his ambition to serve his friend, the millionaire head of this foreign corporation, he must go further and insult the dignity of the State by appealing to the President to send federal soldiery to aid in shooting down his own oppressed fellow citizens." It is interesting to note that in those times the States still considered themselves as sovereign entities and the workings of another state as "foriegn".

President Hayes sent 200 troops from the Second United States Artillery under the command of Col. William H. French. They arrived in Martinsburg on July 19. Shortly thereafter the Statesman reported "a conflict of authority arose between Thos. R. Sharp, master of transportation on the B. & O. railroad and Col. French, commandant of the U. S. troops. Mr. Sharp was sharply informed by Col. French that he did not intend to act under any orders emenating [sic] from him, that he, Col. F. would run the trains to suit himself. We suppose Sharp imagined that the U. S. was but an appendage to the B. & O. Railroad like the Governor and province of West Virginia."

On the evening of the day the troops arrived, strikers began to disband and trains began to move. Even though major violence had been avoided and the work stoppage had concluded in Martinsburg, the Great Railroad Strike of 1877 was just getting started.
