RAILROADS & BASEBALL

In the late 1800's and early 1900's Railroads and Baseball grew up together. They were much more connected than people would now imagine. A perfect pair, both got their start on the east coast and grew from one city to the next. In that era, America was becoming enamored of Baseball. Company teams were springing up everywhere. Steel manufacturers in Pittsburgh, governmental agencies in Washington, DC, and theater companies in New York. Rube Foster from the Palm Beach hotel team "The Breakers" as well as many others went on to form the famed Negro Leagues.

The railroads were no exception. Often they created entire leagues. In the early 1900's Railroads had hired many black porters known as Redcaps. They were to be the basis of the inter railroad Redcap League traveling amongst Pittsburgh, New York and Washington, DC. In September of 1915, Redcaps from Penn Station in New York split a two game series with those of Washington's Union Station at American League Stadium in Washington.

In the late 1800's game times were based on train schedules. At that time, there was no better way to get from game to game. Traveling via rail from one game to the next provided the time and opportunity to game plan and build camaraderie. Sportswriters traveling in the same cars as players and managers were better able to get to know the teams upon whom they reported.

Railroads and Baseball, one Grit, one Glory, hand in hand and marching westward. Together, each in their own way, they helped to make this Great Nation what it is today.
