THE ROYAL GORGE WAR Part 2

The Denver and Rio Grand did not have the resources of their enemy, the Santa Fe. In 1878, the bond holders of the D&RG, fearing ruin in a protracted war with the Santa Fe, forced management to lease the line to the Santa Fe for 30 years. It seemed the war was all but over. In reality, the victory was sort lived. The following year, General Palmer, President of the D&RG went to court to break the lease. At the same time he sent armed men to a string of stone fortifications, set up to defend the gorge.

In the spring of 1879 the Santa Fe began to recruit men for their war with the Denver and Rio Grande. They sent a telegram to Dodge City, Kansas. A group of high spirited men answered that call. Though a very serious concern for the railroads involved, a local paper decribed the adventure as a bit of a lark. The leader of that group though, was Bat Masterson. Among those he recruited to come along were Josh Webb, Ben Thompson and Doc Holliday. When the group of men arrived to the mouth of the gorge, they found it well fortified.

There were a few minor skirmishes, but shortly thereafter, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that the D&RG had prior right to construction in the Royal Gorge. Tensions did cool for a while and both groups sent their men home. General Palmer, though, still had to deal with the lease to the Santa Fe. Two months later, W. B. Strong, Vice President of the Santa Fe, anticipated the judicial dissolution of the lease, but he was certain he would be able too have it reversed. In order to prevent the D&RG from retaking the line before his countermeasures could be effected, he sent his troops back to the stations.
