THE ROYAL GORGE WAR Conclusion

Anticipating the court ordered dissolution of the Royal Gorge lease with the D&RG, W.B. Strong, Vice President of the Santa Fe recommissioned his troops to the stations. Bat Masterson was given command of the Pueblo station and roundhouse, the main point of defense for the Santa Fe.

On July 10, 1879 Judge T.M. Bowen of the Forth Judicial District in Alamosa issued the expected writ dissolving the lease. In anticipation of armed resistance to the retaking of the line, General Palmer of the D&RG had tapped the telegraph lines and spent all the following night monitoring the communications of the Santa Fe. Knowing that Strong expected a reversal of the judicial order the following day, Palmer determined to act quickly. He ordered his men to strike every station early in the morning. Armed with writs of seizure and plenty of men, the D&RG overwhelmed nearly the entire line by noon. Only Pueblo and Bat Masterson held out.

W.F. Weitbrec, Treasurer of the Santa Fe commanded the forces laying siege to Pueblo. Weitbrec, Chief Engineer J.A. McMurtrie and Sheriff Henley Price intended to appropriate the cannon from the state armory in an effort to dislodge the fortified roundhouse. Unfortunately, Masterson had already done just that. The cannon was currently trained on the Santa Fe men. The Santa Fe refused to deliver the station and round house stating that Judge Hallett's court had taken possession of the case, superceding the state court.

At 3:00 Weitbrec, Deputy Sheriff Pat Desmond and fifty D&RG men rushed the station and were able to drive the defenders out the back windows. Surrounding the roundhouse, Weitbrec requested a meeting with Bat Masterson. After a short conversation Masterson ordered his men to surrender the roundhouse. Some later implied that Masterson had accepted a bribe to release the roundhouse, but it is generally believed that Masterson, having no previous access to federal authority, acceded to the writ of seizure and senseless loss of life from further conflict. The Royal Gorge War was over.
