THE CREDIT MOBILIER SCANDAL - Conclusion

Once Oakes Ames, a Massachusetts Representative of the US Congress took over Credit Mobilier, he decided to ratchet up the profits even further. One way to do this was to bribe other members of Congress in exchange for votes and influence benefiting Union Pacific construction and by extension Credit Mobilier.

Shares in the company were sold at par value or even given to Congress members. These in turn could be sold at market value to investors with huge profits to be made. Nearly a dozen members of the House were sold shares, including the Speaker of the House, Schuyler Colfax. Most quickly divested themselves of this stock, never gaining the profits. However, Representative James Brooks of New York did profit handsomely on a large number of these shares.

In 1868, a Credit Mobilier stockholder began a lawsuit against Oakes Ames in a dispute over the availability of stock. During this lawsuit, the New York Sun was able to acquire documents implicating Oakes Ames and the congressional bribery. The Sun broke the story the day before the 1872 election. One of the implicated congressmen, James G. Blaine, who at that time had become Speaker of the House, created a congressional investigation. After it all shook out, only two members were censured; Oakes Ames and James Brooks. No one faced incarceration or fines, though the images of several were temporarily damaged, including the sitting Vice President, Schuyler Colfax, incoming Vice President, Henry Wilson and future President, James A. Garfield. The corruption and resulting investigation did however bring the Union Pacific to the edge of bankruptcy and many of the investors were ruined.
